Egg Layers Are Bred

Poultry breeders find that laying hens are either born with this ability —or they aren't.

This isn't much consolation to you after you have a group of pullets on range during the summer which you expect to house for egg production this fall. But today's research says this ability to lay is inherited. It's been proven that certain strains lay more eggs than other strains, even when fed the same feeds and cared for in the same way.

Some of the factors that make for good egg quality are also inherited. Along about this time of year, you see some thin-shelled eggs in the nests when you gather eggs from your flock. These thin-shelled eggs usually come from layers that have been shelling out large numbers of eggs during the winter season. Apparently, thin-shelled eggs are due to a lowering of the calcium content in the blood of the layers. It's estimated that weak, porous shells result in a 5% loss of the total number of eggs produced each year in the country.

Keep Them Eating

One of the things that you can do during these summer months is to keep the feed consumption of your layers up. During the summer, your birds tend to eat less feed, get less calcium (to make egg shells) than during the winter months. If the diet is adequate, there is no need for you to increase the level of calcium for your birds.

Seeing that your laying hens have a well ventilated house is one of the ways that you can help them keep production up during the summer period. The higher temperatures also mean that the hens will need more waterers than at other times —a doubling of the number usually provided is a safe yardstick to use.

Some flock owners have questions about blood spots in their eggs during this part of the year. The number usually decreases in the fall. Researchers say that nearly all hens lay eggs with the spots at one time or another. Commercial egg candlers have found that about 1 to 2% of all eggs they check have blood spots.

You as a flock owner can do little about them through feeding and management practices. Neither one of these two factors seem to affect them. Poultry breeders are aware of the problem though, and are working to get rid of them. They're particularly objected to by the processors of eggs such as noodle manufacturers and candy manufacturers who want the finest eggs that can be produced.

COUNTRY MUSIC CONTEST AT WARRENTON

Warrenton, Va., Aug. 3.- Warrenton, Virginia becomes the Hillbilly capital of the nation this week-end as the town plays host to the fifth annual National Championship Country Music Contest. Crowds from all over the east are expected to swell the population by some 15,000 persons for the two-day affair.

In past years, many of the winners have been from the metropolitan Washington area, which is some forty miles to the northeast, but domination of the finals on Sunday night is being challenged by winners of Jaycee sponsored contests in other towns. Observers believe that 13-year-old Kenny Cummings, of White Hall, Md., who was the best vocalist of the Annapolis contest, and the Teenage Rascals, of Roanoke, Va., who took top honors with their band in Lynchburg, Va., will be hard to bet.

Contestants will be competing for the coveted title of National Champion as well as for cash prizes in fiddle, banjo, band, vocalist and miscellaneous categories and all of them will be hoping for profession-

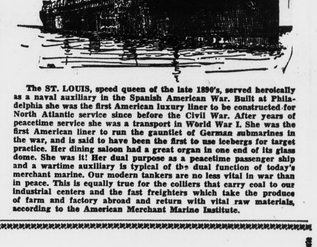
A Famous American Ship



The ST. LOUIS, speed queen of the late 1890's, served heroically as a naval auxiliary in the Spanish American War. Built at Philadelphia she was the first American luxury liner to be constructed for North Atlantic service since before the Civil War. After years of peacetime service she was a transport in World War I. She was the first American liner to run the gauntlet of German submarines in the war, and is said to have been the first to use icebergs for target practice. Her dining saloon had a great organ in one end of its glass dome. She was lit! Her dual purpose as a peacetime passenger ship and a wartime auxiliary is typical of the dual function of today's merchant marine. Our modern tankers are no less vital in war than in peace. This is equally true for the colliers that carry coal to our industrial centers and the fast freighters which take the produce of farm and factory abroad and return with vital raw materials, according to the American Merchant Marine Institute.
